A WORK OF RETRIBUTION.

By the time the inmates of Sans-Souci were assembled round the breakfast-table, discussing their adventures expedition, Thurston was many hiles away, traveling as fast as steam could take him from the seam of it.

the scene of it.

He hardly knew—he certainly did not care—where he was going. He had spoken truly when he told Miss Loring that he had decided to leave Sans-Souci that he had decided to leave Sans-Souci after Mrs. Jennings had uttered her warning the day before; but, since that determination was taken, an age seemed to have passed, so entirely do we "live in feeling, not in figures on a dial." Those hours in the storm, the lonely midnight walk, above all that glance of Agatha's which revealed so much of which he had not dreamed, those things made a great state.

walk, above all that glance of Agatha's which revealed so much of which he had not dreamed—these things made a gap between his life as it had been and his life as it was, which even his thoughts could scarcely bridge.

It is not to be supposed that, in the course of thirty-three years, he had not suffered more or less in matters of the heart, yet he new found himself for the first time under the dominion of a passion—no fancy or sentiment, but a feeling strong as death and overmastering life. Agatha Loring's face was constantly before him, the music of her voice dominated every sound that filled his cars, but he thought that he could find a cure for the infatuation in absence, as he had found a ture for the fever-fits of his younger days.

The idea of yielding, as many men would have yielded, did not for a mement occur to him. He knew that with his whole soul he loved the woman who had ruined Bertie's happiness, and who would thus the felt assured.

ruined Bertie's happiness, and who would ruin (he felt assured) the happiness of any man who trusted his life in her hands; but he said to himself that this love was a mere temporary madness, since no deep passion could flour h where trust was lacking.

"It is an insanity which will pass as quickly as it has come," he thought.

"As for that expression in her eyes last night, I must have imagined it—it is simply impossible that such a woman could find her heart for such a man as I

But to think this was one thing, to feel But to think this was one thing, to feel it another. Trust her? No, he did not trust her. He believed her to be coquette and actress through all her nature; but nevertheless her face as he saw it last—pale, appealing, with eyes that revealed a hundred-fold more than speech could utter—haunted him, turn where he would do what he would. would, do what he would.

Nor was this the record of one day,

Nor was this the record of one day, one week, one month. He put the breadth of States between himself and Sans-Souci; he plunged into the business which partly brought him to America; he sought social distractions; but the end was as the beginning. "When Agatha Loring is done with a man he is fit for nothing but to go the devil as fast as may be," Bertie had said in the mad recklessness of his passion; had this in lesser degree Thurston felt now. He was not ready to go to the devil; but he found existence robbed of its savor as it had never been robbed before. Tormented by passion, by longing, by regret, by self-contempt—what wonder that all things seemed to him worse than empty, he paced the deck of the Ville du Havre, and saw the great expanse of ocean in front, the land receding far and faint behind. "The fight is over, the victory won," he said to himself, and at that moment a woman's laugh floated to him. A woman's laugh! There was surely nothing remarkable in such a sound, yet, as it fell on his car, his heart seemed to stand still. He inrued abruptly and found himself face to face with gatha Loring! She was as much astonished as found himself face to face with Agatha Loring: She was as much astonished as himself, and perhaps ies touch artisted; but, beyond a certain change of color and expression perceptible on both faces, neisther of them betrayed this agitation. To people of their class conventionalities are second nature; and the lookers on kad no reason to suppose their meeting to be other than that of two ordinary acquaintances. They shook hands and uttered a few commonplaces. Then Thurston said:

she looked at him with cool, almost haughty, surprise.
"One must pay a price for all diversions," said she, carelessly, "and sometimes it is heavier than one anticipates. I'hope we shall have a pleasant voyage, though the season is rather against us, Have you ever crossed the ocean before in November?"

Have you ever crossed the ocean before in November?"

After a few more remarks, they parted —she to rejoin her party, he to go and endeavor to control the tunult of his thoughts alone with a cigar.

To do so was not easy. One glance from those wonderful eyes, one tone of that magical voice, had been enough to shatter all his funcied victory. What had months of combat availed? He asked the question in a sort of despair, and the answer was—less than nothing. The fascination which controlled him was deeper now than when he left Sanssouci; the passion that he vainly imagined he had crushed was strong enough to defy his utmost efforts to subdue it. A sense of impotence—of being overmastered by a Fate relentless as that of agined he had crushed was strong enough to defy his utmost efforts to subdue it. A sense of impotence—of being over-unastered by a Fate relentless as that of Greek tragedy—began to possess him. He had thought that the chapter in his life in which Agatha Loring's name was written was closed forever, and lo! here on the very ship which was to have borne him from even the memory of his infetu-destined yet to play?

"One way or another she will come between us and separate us," he said to hinself. "Of that I have felt an instinct from the first. Well, it is useless to struggle against the inevitable. 'If the gods force him, who can shun his fate?''

If he could not shun his fate, he found, however, that it was easy enough—easier, indeed, than he liked—to shun Miss Horing. Unless he sought her attention directly, she never seemed conscious of his presence. Here, as elsewhere, she had a court of cavaliers around her, and it was with a very sore, jealous feeling that he watched her gracefal, subtile coquetry—the long promenade with one, it was with a very sore, jealous feeling that he watched her gracefal, subtile coquetry—the long promenade with one, the quiet flirtation with another, the seductive charm with all. Plainly Agatha Loring was Agatha Loring still, and had not lost a single attribute of her distinctive character. The realization of this might have cured Thurston, but—it did not do so. He felt sure that he had been worse than a fool ever to dream that she had given him a deeper thought than she gave any other victim of her caprice; but the assurance was by nomeans consoling. In fact, he had reached that stage of passion when reason forsakes a man, and he is ready to act with a recklessness to which he often looks back as veritable madness.

Several days passed, and the steamer was in mid-ocean, before there c. me any change in the situation. Then, toward stinset one evening, Thurston, by a rare chance, found Agatha on leck alone.

She was leaning over the bulwark, watching the sun sink in the vast expanse of heaving sea—his last rays gilding the tossing waves with red glory—and, as Thurston drew ne r, he saw her face in profile before she observed his approach. Seeing it thus, he was struck by its expression of strangely wistful and almost bitter sadness—an expression so new to his knowledge of it, that he hesitated for an instant before advancing to her side.

wisdom as the human heart? Thurston, however, turned a deaf car to all that it could urge; and, being a man who held his desires in a strong leash of control, he found himself at last on shipboard without having received a single item of information regarding the woman whom he had vainly tried to banish from his memory.

There is no doubt that Fate seems sometimes to take a malignant pleasure in befiling an when we feel ourselves most secure. So Thurston felt—though it was a very dreary kind of security—as he paced the deck of the Ville du Havre, and saw the great expanse of ocean in front, the land receding far and faint behind. "The fight is over, the victory won" he said thing? I could have a word an and in all your career of conquest you have never tested—you never can test—that power more thoroughly than you have tested it with me." She was silent; her face bent downward, so that he could not see it, her hand clasping the scarlet drapery of her shew! closer around her slender figure. The sun was gone, and twilight began to fall over the wide waste of tossing waters, when she spoke:

when she spoke:

"Will you believe me if I say I am surprised and—sorry? I never dreamed of testing my powers on you; I never imagined for a moment that I could succeed if I attempted to do so. But surely one whom you dislike and despise cannot

He uttered a short laugh.

"That depends on your definition of much." If I were wise, I should not let you harra me, certainly, but I am not wise. You are mistaken, however, in thinking that I dislike and despise you. "Let me go!" she gasped. "This is madness, for which—if I answered you—

"If you can save yourself, don't think of me," Agatha said. "I will try and not

He smiled a little. "Do you think I will ever let you go?" he said. "We are together now—for life or death."

He clasped her in his arms, and their lips met in the first, last kiss of love.

So they went down together—to death.

"Why, no she hasn't," replied Emeline, "for I took it into my room with me and it is there now." Then the doctor ceased feeling the unequal pulse and instituted semi-professional investigations. It was found that Mrs. Jornsen had not made a mistake at all in taking her medicine; the lady became suddenly and abruptly wide awake; the doctor left a madder man—he couldn't have been a wiser—and the Jornsen family generally put in the slight remainder of the night in an unsetisfactory and rather sleepless manner.—San Francisco Chronicle.

Air every sleeping room thoroughly every morning, and, if possible, let in the sun to shine on the bed and bed cloths. Often at night when the heat is well-nigh unbearable, a wet cloth hung in the window over the blind will cool the room as if a shower had fallen, and every one kr ws how water poured on the pavement in front of the door will freshen the hot, dry air. This principle of the reduction of temperature by evaporation is capable of much practical application. In India, and other tropical countries, where ice is almost unknown, the natives cool their drinking water by suspending earthern jars filled with it in a brisk current of air, which process is said to cool it thoroughly and rapidly. So, also, when ice is unattainable butter may be kept firm and sweet by etting the bowl containing it in a shallow vessel of water and covering with a napkin, the ends of which are well immersed in the water in a bottom dish. II. R. Stevens, Esq.: Dear Sir—This is to certify that my daughter was taken siek when she was three years old, and got so low that we were obliged to keep her on a pillow, without moving, to keep the little thing tegether. She was attended by several physicians—the regular attending one being old Dr. John Stevens. They all pronounced her case incumble. She had been sick about a year, when hearing of the great Blood Remedy, Vigiettny, I commenced giving her that, and continued it regularly till she was about seven years old, when she was pronounced perfectly cured. During her sickness three pieces of bone were taken from her right arm above the elbow, one of them being very long. Several small pieces were also taken from her left leg. She is now twenty-seven years old, and is enjoying good health, and has ever since she was seven years old, with no signs of Serofula or any other blood disease. Her arm is a little crooked, but she can use it almost as well as the other. Her legs are of equal length, and she is not in the least lance. Her case was Scrofula, inherited in the blood; and I would recommend all those having Serofula Humer or any other blood disease. If they wish to have a perfect cure, to try Vegettie, the reliable blood remedly, which does not weaken the system like many other preparations recommended, but, on the contrary, it is nourishing and strengthening. My daughter's case will fully testify this, for I never saw nor heard of a worse form of Serofula.

THE CRUCIAL TEST of the value of a medicine is time. Does experience confirm the claims put forth in its favor at the outset? is the grand question. Apply this criterion, so simple, yet so searching, to Tarrant's Experience Test and to-day?

Tarrant's Scitzer Aperient is a household name throughout the United States. It is administered as a specific, and with success, in dyspepsia, sick headache, nervous debility, liver complaint, bilious remittents, bowel complaints, (especially constipation, rheumation, gout, gravel, mausea, the complaints peculiar to the maternal sex, and all types of inflammation. This is to certify that I purchased from J. W. Chapman & Co., last Summer, a No. 4 (9 feet long) Perpetual Evaporator, (galvanized from,) with which I made over eight hundred gallons of Syrup from Sorghum and Imphee canes. I made, under favorable circumstances, as high as ten gallons per hour, and think that I could make with suitable mill from 75 to 100 gallons per day. The Evaporator is simple in construction, easily operated, and makes an article of Syrup unsurpassed by any other that I have seen. The cheapness, (as compared with others.) greater amount of boiling surface and simplicity of construction, certainly give it the pre-eminence over all others.

John B. Watson, Agent Pomona Grange, Anderson County, S. C.:

Dear Sire—Yours of the 26th inst., respecting the merits of the "Chapman Perpetual Evaporator, is received. In reply, I used a No. 2 (galvanized) Evaporator last year, at a cost of fifteen dollars, with which I made one thousand and fifteen gallons of molasses, equal in quality to any I have seen. I made from 40 to 50 gallons per day, (i. c., in ten hours.) The labor of making was light and pleasant. It is so constructed that in operating requires but very little labor, much less than that of "Cook's Evaporator." In fact, I feel warranted in saying that from observation and information of others, that the "Chapman Evaporator" has no superior, if an equal, and at less than half the cost. I can certainly recommend it in preference to any other, belog fully convinced that a trial will satisfy any one, however skeptical.
